FAQS

When would a neuropsychological evaluation be a service to consider for a child and what would it provide?

The possible negative effects of not examining how a child learns and problem solves are significant in terms of social adjustment, academic achievement and sense of self. An evaluation of the child provides a learning experience for all involved to better understand the child's cognitive and emotional functioning acknowledgement of where they shine to promote ongoing mastery and pride in these skills. While parents may be apprehensive about the process, the children are often relieved at getting attention for their difficulties and welcome the opportunity to understand their struggles.
